Mrs. Atchison and Ardmore had given their last touches to the preparations for everywhere entwined; nor were the Stars and Stripes neglected. They surveyed the long table in the dining-room, where gold and silver and crystal were bright upon the snowy napery.

'The matter of precedence is serious Tommy," urgd Mrs. Atchison. "I can not for the life of me remember what two monarchs do about entering a room at the same time."

"Nor do I. Nellie." said Ardmore: "un less they sprint for the door and the one who gets through first takes the head of the table. Still, that would be undigwould jar the divine right."

"Here in democratic America," Griswold, joining them, "there can be no such preposterous idea of precedence." "I should think better of that notion Prof. Griswold," laughed Mrs. Atchison

"If I had never seen the goats carefully shepherded to keep them away from the lambs at functions in Washington. Democracy may be a political triumph, but it is certainly deficient socially. Personally I have always wished to bring myself in touch with the poor. Ardy is quite right that our own kind are distinctly uninteresting."

'You ought to remember, Nellie, that your idea of going slumming in a pur-ple coupe and dressed up in your best rags is not well calculated to inspire confidence and affection among the sub merged. But how to handle two governors has me fussed. You are the hostess, and it's for you to decide which excellency shall take you in. I see no way cut but to match for it.

Gov. Osborne rose.

"In politics," he began, resting his hand gently on the jug, "it would be a fine thing if we could all live up to our noblest ideas; but unfortunately we must be all things to all men. What I have here is not merely the testimonial of a valued constituent, but something much subfler than that, ladies and gentlemena delicate proof that those of us who would command the good will and suffrages of the people must keep a careful eye on the weather-vane.
